Collaboradate helps to organize online dating with a new email service.

Walnut Creek, CA, March 30, 2006 — Is your email inbox overflowing with email from other online daters? Don't know where to start? Collaboradate.com hopes it can help you with that problem. CDinBox, a service from collaboradate.com, plans to organize your dating inbox.

Forbes reports online-dating-service revenues topping $214 million in the first half of 2003 (Woulfe). "People made a big deal over online dating in years past, as if there were something sleazy about it," said Dena of Raleigh, NC. "These days, everyone I know is using an online dating service or has tried one -- or several. It's lost some of its stigma."

With so many singles dating online, some on multiple sites, users may be experiencing information overload. Andy Arnott, CTO of MEDIAFILL LLC, the parent company of collaboradate.com, says that he wants to give online daters a one stop shop for all of their dating correspondence. "It can be a very tedious process, to login to each site and check all of your personals mail". "Collaboradate users can simply sign up for a free @collaboradate.com email address and then enter that address at all of their dating sites". "Now all they need to do is sign into one site and read all personals mail at one site."

Collaboradate.com is a new totally free dating service, which has a very different spin. Featuring some web 2.0 technologies, based on AJAX (Asynchronous JavaScript And Xml) like "Date Mapping", personals metadating, tool tips, and CDinBox.

The service was recently featured in an article on wired.com (Lynn), and was noted for some of its distinctive features. "The Collaboradate profile differs from other dating sites in two major ways. One is the one-click access to contact information. The other is that it allows a wider range of content, more akin to MySpace than Match.com. Traditionally, dating services strip out any potential contact information or external links you try to include." The service has two main features in addition to the more standard search-and-bookmark tools. One is "My Dating Usernames," where you store your online dating and social networking handles. You can display these with your profile or hide them, granting access to the juicy details on a per-user basis.

The other is "DateMapping," which plots members visually on a Google map. "It doesn't give your exact location," Andy says, citing privacy and safety concerns. "It'll give you an overview of where you are, and you can zoom out and see the surrounding areas right in the profile view."
