Analysis

Education Web sites are generally in line with the overall ISAR index, although they have been on the underperforming side of the index 7 of the last 11 years. Because these sites scores are just average or slightly below, Education sites have underperformed the 5-year criteria benchmarks in all areas. Content and copywriting are Education Web sites strong points. It is no surprise that technology and innovation are their weak points.

When it comes to Web development, many education sites tend to be followers, not leaders. The best sites are integrating video and Flash animation to make learning exciting and dynamic. The youth of today are spending more time on the Internet than in front of TV. Educators need to use this trend to their benefit.

Analysis

Web sites rejoined the WebAwards in 2004 after being removed for four years. They have matched the ISAR index twice, performed dismally in 2005, and outperformed the index most recently in 2007. School Web sites perform best in content, design, and ease of use. They score lower in innovation and technology. School Web sites lag the 4-year criteria averages in all areas except for design which it matches.

School Web sites are becoming increasingly more important as a resource tool for students, parents, and the administration of school systems. Though often limited by budget restraints, administrations see the benefits and necessity of bringing their schools online.

Analysis

University Web sites have demonstrated split performance within the ISAR index. They outperformed the index five times, underperformed four times, and matched the index twice. University sites have underperformed the 5-year criteria benchmark averages in all areas. They score highest in content, copywriting, and design, but lag in innovation, technology, and, more recently, ease of use.

Today's university students have grown up on the Internet and are a driving force of things to come. If a university does not embrace this and actively work to protect their online reputation, students will go elsewhere.
