Surprising Findings from the National Survey of Couples Creating Stepfamilies

The Remarriage Checkup

by Ron L. Deal, MMFT, and David H. Olson, PhD

1. Our research reveals that a positive response to these ten items predicts a highly satisfactory relationship with over 90% accuracy.

- A partner's moodiness is not an issue in the relationship.
- Each person feels understood by their partner.
- Couples are able to resolve their differences.
- Couples enjoy many of the same leisure activities.
- Couples are creative in how they handle differences.
- Couples agree on how to spend money.
- Affection is used fairly and sexuality is healthy.
- Partners are not overly involved or influenced by their families or previous partners.
- Couples have worked out parent and stepparent responsibilities and roles.
- Each partner feels close to the other.

2. The number one relationship problem for remarried couples is dealing with complex stepfamily issues.

Making the differences between first marriages and remarriages undeniable, our research reveals that an astonishing 7 of the top 12 stumbling blocks for remarriage couples are related to a past relationship breakup (e.g., divorce) or to the complications of being a stepfamily.

3. The remarriage divorce rate is between 10-25% higher than first marriages. Why does that occur?

Fear and jealousy account for a lot of it and predict with 93% accuracy whether couples have a close, intimate remarriage or a struggling, unhappy one.

4. Jealousy is a problem for one-third of all remarried couples.

5. Most couples agree that children put an additional stress on a remarriage.

Eighty-five percent of couples believe that the children will put additional stress on the relationship—and they're right!

6. Our study reveals that the single most important predictor of successful remarriage is the acceptance of and satisfaction with your partner's personality.

7. People don't know their partner as intimately as they think.

When trying to predict the satisfaction level of their partner, couples are wrong 75% of the time.

TALKING POINTS

8. Newly married stepparents often feel duped.

Dating partners tend not to favor their children until after the wedding.

9. A relationship based solely on sex is in trouble.

Sex only accounts for about 13% of what contributes to a healthy, intimate relationship in remarriage (and 10% in first marriage).

10. People marry because they fall in love with a person, but they often divorce because of the complications of the stepfamily.

Eighty-eight percent of individuals expected difficulty related to having a stepfamily and 86% thought having children from previous relationships would add stress to their marriage—and they are right. It does.

11. Nearly half (46%) of unhappy partners feel left out when their spouse spends time with their children.

The majority of partners in healthy couples, by contrast, do not (82%).

12. How long couples with children date prior to the wedding is not as important to their long-term success as how well they prepare for parenting and stepparenting challenges.

Unhealthy couples are about twice as likely to have not adequately discussed how they will raise the children together.

13. Two-thirds of all remarried couples have financial issues that are tied to their past relationships.

Debts, bills, and settlements are among the top relationship issues for remarried couples.

14. When money concerns—especially those related to child support, alimony, or child care expenses for stepchildren—are paired with jealousy, remarried couples have even more struggles.
