The InSource Group Launches New Federal Division

New division to provide comprehensive technology solutions to federal government projects

DALLAS, June 8, 2011 — The InSource Group, a software-product development, technical consulting and information technology-support services company, announces the launch of a new website devoted exclusively to its growing federal division. With this new development, the company offers the same exceptional level of IT staffing and tech expertise to the government sector that it has brought to other industries for nearly 20 years.

“To complement The InSource Group’s federal government initiative, we are pleased to announce our new website,” says chief operating officer Jim Thompson. “The new site captures our capabilities and our experience and is an informative portal for those seeking an exceptional technological resource partner in the federal sector.”

Jason James helms The InSource Group’s federal division. James brings plenty of expertise to his position: He was employed in the Department of Defense and federal workspaces for many years, and his past experience includes five years as an Army information systems analyst and a more recent stint as Fortinet’s federal systems integrator manager.

The InSource Group’s new federal division provides a complete spectrum of flexible solutions for IT needs. In addition to fulfilling staffing requests such as contract, contract-to-hire and direct-hire options, its long-standing and proven technology capabilities include:

- Software development
- Network assessment
- Telecom support
- Help desk support
- Network security
- Database administration
- System administration
- Web management

More information about this suite of IT services — as well as other relevant information — can be found on The InSource Group’s new federal division website, <http://insourcegroupfederal.com>.
