“We live quite differently now than those who went before us. In years past people interacted more with their living environment. The crackle of a wood fire, the aroma of a gas lamp, the glow of a candle lit room; these things all stimulated their senses, became part of how they felt, part of how they viewed their surroundings and part of how they lived. Today people are moving too fast, not engaging with those around them, missing, forgetting. I’m hoping we can help people to remember to slow down, and take it all in.”
