Chapter One

The Seeds of Hating Chocolate Cake

---

Children's cheers and giggling vitalized the normally quiet Tuttle
dining room. It was the fifteenth — Danni's birthday. The balloons were filled.

Streamers were hung.
Preschoolers played.
New friends were made.
And
in the backyard, an exuberant game of tag was being waged.

Five-year-old Danni got up on her tiptoes — sporting the new,
powder blue dress her mother had insisted she wear.
She
stretched for the manual camera which was always just out of reach.

On the top of the dresser, its boxy shape beckoned to be explored.
More tantalizing than the promise of any gift-wrapped
toy,
what happened inside the metal, silver and black contraption intrigued her.
Black and white portraits and color snapshots — often of them or from her father's sudden travels abroad — had been hidden from almost everyone's view.
Only a few had been framed.
The rest were quickly destroyed.

“Don't, Danni. You'll break it,” Marnie shooed her away. The former homecoming queen's premature worry lines and wrinkles, poorly hidden under overpriced moisturizer and makeup, only made Danni's mother appear much older than her thirty-one years.
Suspicions of multiple extramarital affairs had depleted her.
And ideas more somber than those had consumed her waking hours.

“Now, you just turn the ring until everything you see looks clear.”

In the habit of ignoring his wife's cautioning, Daniel held the camera to the eye of his elder child.
Danni's small hands gripped it
hungrily.
If nothing else came from his marriage, Daniel knew he had a child who was like him — almost as good as a son, he thought,
but not quite.

He was already following in his father's footsteps.
The late nights, the disappearances, the lies, the denials.
Even though he wanted to protect his children from hardship,
deep down, he feared that he couldn't.
He wasn't willing to stay faithful. And he was afraid to admit his transgressions.

Every time he looked into his little girls' eyes, he saw tiny reminders of the conduct he'd hated.
He
saw their trust and adoration.
But, he knew he was repaying it with kindness that only softened betrayal.

By the age of eleven,
Daniel had almost grown numb to the sounds of his mother's crying.

But, the sight of her cascading tears always drove him to fury. He blamed her for staying in a dead-end relationship. He both hated and loved his father and saw him as a tragic, misunderstood figure.

The similarities in their behavior hadn't escaped Daniel's notice.
And
as he considered the effects of what he planned to do next,
the unwitting child nuzzled between his arms abruptly fidgeted.

Danni's
new garment's tags
were once again chafing her neck.
The
spreading rash on her nape testified while her father sympathetically steadied his heavy Pentax K1000.
Tomboyish, Danni wasn't a dress girl. But, she was very interested in trying to make her mother happy.

Shifting the camera an inch,
Danni framed a much more affable subject.
Marnie's
younger sister was much beloved, but equally exhausted.

More emotionally stable
 at a mere twenty-eight, Jackie hid well-earned resentment beneath layers of often called-upon familial duty.

Jackie was more like a mother to Marnie's children than an aunt.
 But, her uncertainty of what might happen without her active supervision would never allow her to say no — no matter what time, day or night.
 When the phone rang, safeguarding her nieces from trauma became Jackie's number one priority.

But, mostly she wanted
 Danni and Grace to know and love their mother.
 She wanted them to know her soul and not the shell — the woman
 Marnie
used to be who was still clawing for freedom.

Moving on, Danni focused on three-year-old Grace.
 Tattling, the cherub-faced toddler cried out wanting equal time with their father.
 Jealously objecting to her high chair's oppressive restrictions, she tried to climb out, but was quickly returned to her seat.
 "Then, you push the button," Daniel instructed.

Framing her traitorous sibling out of the photo, Danni complied, releasing the shutter. Candy-coated, grateful lips greeted Daniel's cheek, kissing him, as he reset his camera on the dresser and turned to face his firstborn.
 Thrilled by their shared affection and secret, Danni ran back into the dining room — scarcely bothered by the guests she'd seen in passing, but hardly knew.

She wrapped her arms around her mother's leg.
 "All right, you guys.
 I need you to be good," Marnie requested.
 "In a minute, it'll be cake time for the birthday girl!" The children cheered.
 Inching
 closer,
 neighborhood kids eagerly snatched
 paper plates and plastic utensils from the table.

Watching her festive display being reduced to disarray, Marnie forced a strained smile, agitated.
 "One at a time,"
 she gently guided.

Scanning the living room, shaking,
 Marnie grew angrier by the second.
 With her husband nowhere in sight, she began balling her fists. He was ruining the party — both for her

and for Danni – was all the mother of two envisaged as Jackie returned bearing treats.
 “So, who wants ice cream cake?”
 Jackie teased as more cries of approval welcomed her and her thawing confection.

Saucer-like eyes and greedy hands waited all around the table while their second-in-command hostess
 led the group in “Happy birthday to you.”

Freeing herself
 from Danni’s grasp, Marnie left the chorus behind
 and entered the living room. In his usual hiding spot, Daniel hurriedly tipped back his bourbon.
 Extinguishing
 his
 cigarette, he grabbed his camera and briskly walked past his wife.
 “Make a wish, Danni,” he encouraged, focusing his lens on a trio.

With a cautious look to her sister, Jackie smiled – sandwiched between Danni and Grace.
 Facing the living room wall, seething,
 Marnie
 spun around furious – in time for her daughter to blow out her candles and the camera's bright

 flash.
 He'd
 deliberately excluded her again — this time, from future memories — was the only firm conclusion she drew.

Slapping her inconstant lover, Marnie froze, humiliated.
 The diamond ring she'd turned to hurt him had left a scratch on his face.
 Remorse quickly overwhelmed her as crimson dripped from his jawline.
 Braving the disdain of their children and houseguests, Daniel's attacker saw a myriad of frightened eyes before she fled for the stairs.

"I'll be right back," Daniel reassured them.
 Taking
 Jackie's offered napkin, he blotted at the blood on his cheek.
 Calmly setting down his camera, he squeezed the birthday girl's shoulder.
 A wink later, he was in the hallway.
 His
 wife was perched on the middle step.

Daniel had seen glimpses of Marnie's vulnerability.
Her emotional meltdowns and irritability had been a part of their past.
But, regardless of how many times she went to see her psychotherapist, when times got tough, she would grow silent and then explode like a blast.

It was a moment that Marnie had never wanted in public.
She'd dreamed of seeing her husband beg absolution veiled by locked doors.
That day, her home
had many witnesses – with humble mouths, but big voices. Word of her actions would fly like lightning. And all the rumors would return.

Marnie
ached to be that girl he'd married.
If he'd known the true depths of her battle, she feared he'd never have asked.
He'd wanted the prom queen who graciously handled her problems.
With a smile, she'd hide darkness.
And with a kiss, she'd possess.
But, many years of masquerading had left her body prostrated. She'd prayed to put her foot down lightly.
Instead, she'd stomped through the floor.

Maybe if she hadn't gotten dirty, Danni suspected, her parents wouldn't be fighting. And everything would be fine.
 She'd advisedly stayed off the grass, reveling – avoiding stains from roughhousing.
 But, a playmate had spilled juice on her hem.
 “I cut the biggest slice for you.” Jackie hoped to distract her young niece with a plate close to Danni.

Giving a big kiss, she paused, probing
 shadowy eyes – bottomless pools, satiated with unresolved questions.
 “Happy birthday,” Jackie bid her, resuming cake-doling duties.
 Amid the roar of her fellow children, Danni surveyed her favorite dessert. But, chocolate ice cream roused
 no appetite.

“No, Grace. Honey, give that to me,” Jackie chided. Removing a plastic knife
 from sticky, grabbing hands, she promptly replaced it with a far more innocuous spoon.
 “Your daughter and her friends are all waiting for you to return,” Daniel extended, angling for peace the next hour.

“And what about you?”
 Marnie asked sharply.
 He alertly indulged her.

Bypassing her contemptuous expression, he hissed, “Nothing could possibly make me happier.” “I’ll alert the media...and your mistress,” Marnie related.
 Verbally backed into a corner, Daniel faltered, surprised.

“Should I alert Jackie, too?” she continued.
 “Now, you’re just being unreasonable...and a selfish fucking bitch,” he countered. “For the first time in months, you’re just mad something’s not about you.”
 “Get out,” Marnie demanded in a fierce, biting whisper.
 The pure conviction of her tone and gaze sent chills of fear
 down Daniel’s spine.

“I’m not going anywhere. This is my house,” he objected.
 “And
 my family.”
 Chest tightening and pulse quickening, he stepped forward. “Why don’t you go?
 You can spend some more time with your sister.” “I said leave!” she shrieked, frenzied.
 Shoving him backwards,
 she
 rose.
 Scrambling, Daniel caught hold of the banister, stumbling.
 An inch between his head and a family portrait convinced him to go.

“I’m out of here, just like you wanted.” He snatched
his army green jacket.
Tempted to turn and take his children, he headed straight for the door. “Wait!”

“Look at what a mess you are, Gracie,” Jackie
playfully scolded. Trying to corral the children’s attention, she fruitlessly directed all eyes to Grace’s chocolate-covered face.

“Please don’t do this,” Marnie pleaded.
Giving chase, she clutched at Daniel’s sleeve. “Let go,” he ordered.
“This isn’t working.”

Wriggling free, he left the cotton cloak, limp in her hand.
It was a frosty farewell – more than he’d originally wanted. But, his extrication was fundamental.
And Marnie had given him the out.
“Fine!
Leave!”
Marnie screeched, desperate, as Daniel stalked out the front door.

In his mind, he’d been rehearsing – daily working up the nerve to tell her that he wanted to go. But, retreat was much simpler.

 “We don’t need you!” she bawled. “Go back to your whores
 and your diseases!
 You’re worse than nothing!” she roared.
 Hurling a vase
 into the driveway, Marnie missed her moving target.
 The porcelain
 crashed,
 breaking into pieces – scattering wilting dahlias around Daniel’s antsy feet.

“Okay, everybody. It’s game time!” Jackie turned up the stereo and ushered children from the proscenium to the yard.
 No longer accepting indifference, she physically moved them, when needed.
 As Daniel started his car, Marnie collapsed to the floor.
 “Now,” Jackie exhorted, hustling Danni outside with the others.

As her brother-in-law drove out of sight, she handed Grace off and joined her sister in the hall.
 “I’m their mother, not you,” Marnie howled, falsely accusing. “Bring them back inside. They’re mine.” “I won’t. Get up!”
 Jackie
 helped Marnie to her feet. Sympathetic to her sibling’s delusions, Jackie guided Marnie back to the stairs and to the empty master bedroom.
 Marnie sobbed as she crawled into her bed, fully-dressed. “I’m sorry, Jackie,” she confessed. "This time was child's play," Jackie assured her.

As Jackie turned off the dining room light, Danni ran to her room upstairs wrapped inside Daniel's green jacket. Unaware of her niece's acquisition, Jackie topped the staircase
and sighed.
Further catastrophe had been avoided.
"I'm headin' out,
Mar.
Do you need anything else?"
Lingering in the doorway, Jackie prepared for a brief,
but instantaneous pardon.

Their
childhood home had brought back memories, but felt extraordinarily empty without their parents' blithe presence.
"I can stay for a few more hours," she proffered.
Resisting the instinct to stroke her sister's hair, Jackie sat at Marnie's bedside, reluctant. Striped, gypsy tabbies expected her evening arrival.

Without her handouts, the strays would find food to eat elsewhere. But,
Jackie
longed for their affection – and the fleeting comfort they gave.
"Marnie,
talk to me." The house was clean.

The girls were both in bed. And the sun was setting.

“Everyone had lots of fun,” Jackie exaggerated.

But, dread filled her as she reached for the nightstand lamp.

“Wake up,” she demanded.

“We need to talk before I go.”

But, Jackie’s long-ago idol wouldn’t regain consciousness without assistance. The pain she’d been suffering for years felt ever-present and suffocating.

It clouded her judgment and made it impossible for her to conceive of a future without its dominion. The prescription bottle of sleeping pills, nearly empty beside Marnie, indicated her intention. Jackie’s heart began racing as she shook her. The situation was familiar, but one she’d wish she could forget.

“How many did she take?” a no-nonsense, emergency room doctor questioned, shining a light in Marnie’s eyes. He hadn’t slept in over twenty-six hours. And his patient’s willful attempt on her life had revived indignation.

 He'd seen good people fight for their lives and succumb to violent, tragic death.

"I don't know," Jackie shared, helpless.

"But,
 the bottle was empty when I got there. And she's also on anti-depressants." The hospital room reeked of harsh cleaning supplies and fresh vomit.

"Which one? Has she done this before?" Jackie faltered. Fearing the inevitable consequences of disclosure,
 she admitted the details, knowing they might keep the kids safe.

As if she sensed what would be coming next, Marnie sprang into action.

Limbs flailing, she fought with all of her might.
 They were trying to save her, she realized, double-crossed by her fallacious salvation. The drugs hadn't killed her. They'd simply left her weak. Inarticulate and uncoordinated, she hadn't a chance to prevail.

Guttural noises emerged from her throat.

"A little help here," the doctor directed.

Almost instantly, two nurses pounced. Marnie's entreaties fell on deaf ears. Even in her compromised state, her strength was surprising. But, at the sight of Danni, horrified, she stopped wrestling and gave in.

Regret and defeat overwhelmed her as Danni backed from the doorway.

Ashamed and fractured,

Marnie surrendered to unwelcome rescue.

“Someone please take Ms. Tuttle to the waiting room.”

“Everett,”

Jackie corrected

the doctor. “I’m not leaving you, honey.” Whether Marnie understood her or not, she wouldn’t go without giving an explanation. “I’m right here...We’re here.”

But,

that was the last thing Marnie cared to consider – public failure, her family’s suffering,

having to recover and disappointing them

all.

Escorted by a stern nurse,

Jackie

entered the hallway as Danni ran to where she’d been instructed to stay.

“You’ll be a bigger help to your sister later,” Nurse Thelma guaranteed. She had a job to do. And Jackie was getting

the

way.

Deflated,
Jackie observed from a safe distance — activated charcoal, an IV — all the necessary
tools of resuscitation.
Sixteen summers before, they had been on vacation. The hospital staff seemed more frantic. But, the procedure appeared much
the same.

Rushing to a seat, Danni
picked up a magazine. Whenever her father had wanted to be left alone, he'd always grabbed something to read.
Or he'd lift up his camera. The latter, for Danni, wasn't an option. The hospital's resources were lean. And she was grateful for anything that might conceal her tracks.

Danni hoped that her father would come soon and visit.
She knew something was wrong. But, she assumed he could fix it.

"I hope you're not sick, little girl," a voice teased.
In
blue jeans
and a green button-down, the man seated across from Danni grinned. He'd been waiting for some time, for the most part, unnoticed.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR

Kenya D. Williamson is a verse novel and short fiction author, poet, screenwriter, actress and occasional blogger from Levittown, Pennsylvania. Currently residing in Los Angeles, California, she writes scripts for TV, film and the internet and has acted in dozens of commercials, films and TV shows.

With a passion for writing comedy, drama and suspense, Kenya began her professional writing career as a screenwriter. After many years of performing – in TV shows, movies, plays, musicals, choirs and orchestras – she relished the opportunity to work behind the scenes (and eat a few carbohydrates).
