Chinavasion has been quick to expand into the smart home security alarm systems market with a new range of products following unprecedented demand from do it yourself homeowners who are operating on a budget.

The Internet of things, (IOT) has made smart home security systems a dependable way to monitor a property from almost anywhere on the globe. These security systems allow remote monitoring and control of a number of detectors such as door sensors, surveillance cameras, sirens, smoke/gas detectors, temperature, humidity and water sensors, all from a smartphone.

Most home alarm systems come with enough components for a small apartment and include a control panel, window / door sensor and PIR motion detection sensor. They typically allow for up to 100 sensors to be added so everything from single room apartments to the largest of mansions can be comprehensively monitored.

Due to great affordability China wholesalers, Chinavasion, report a considerable rise in the demand for smart home alarm products and now sports a growing range of options for DIY alarm consumers.

PR Manager at Chinavasion, Ms. Rose Li, Says, "The ability to build a system for you own particular needs means users get exactly what they are looking for and can easily add extra sensors as those needs change." This means that consumers can get an affordable starter pack and can then slowly add extra sensors as and when required.

Another attraction of wireless smart home security systems is the ease of setup, allowing most consumers to do all the installation themselves.

"As the majority of sensors don't require any cabling, there's no need for expert installation, complicated cabling or expensive setup fees, so these do-it-yourself alarms setups are ideal for homeowners on a budget as they can be easily installed, upgraded and maintained." Advised Ms. Li.

Unlike many alarms the majority of the smart home security alarms are not connected to an independent monitoring station, and for that reason these kits will typically have no monthly subscription fees. Should any of the sensors be triggered the system can send out notifications via the associate smartphone app or with an SMS message. "If you get an alert you can see exactly which sensor was triggered and even tune in via the video feed or listen to the two way audio to see if it's an intruder or just your cat who's set of the detectors." Rose Li Said.

There is a rapidly growing range of smart alarm systems to cater to almost every need of the tech savvy consumer. Wholesale Electronics company, Chinavasion, already supplies a number of options to markets around the world and all products come with a 12 month warranty while also benefiting from global express shipping.
