Sessio’s new business app makes collaborating with colleagues a breeze

As any businessman will tell you, time is money. No matter the sector, everyone wants to cut down on unnecessary mistakes that waste both. No one recognises this more than Sessio, the developer of a new augmented-reality app, designed to make collaborating at work quick, simple and easy.

The app, also called Sessio, allows two Android users to work together, sharing VOIP audio and photos that can be edited using touch-screen drawing technology. Rather than waste time describing the problem blindly over the phone, workers can snap a picture, circle the problem area, and attach a brief note with a description. The end result is a unique and effective business tool that has led commentators to label the app “Snapchat for businesses”.

This technology has already proved a hit. A trial customer from the maintenance sector found Sessio perfectly suited to construction jobs, claiming the app cut down time that was previously wasted driving to sites and that it would save them money “in a real, black-and-white way.”

It’s clear the app is something Sessio is passionate about. “This is the tech that we built to industrialise our own processes,” founder Tomas Westerholm told us. “Sessio can help businesses reduce stress, limit error and collect data. We’re looking forward to the new release very much.”

Sessio is available for Android devices, with the newest version available at the Google Play store. The company recently announced a smooth running, bug-free upgrade, which will be released soon to an eager user base.

“Sessio’s efficiency has led critics to label the app “the Snapchat for businesses”

Sessio’s developers are also the minds behind Skyhigh.vc, an emerging platform that’s being called the “Fiverr for Architecture”. It promises to deliver remarkable opportunities for architects and clients in the near future.
