Tipline lets kids stand up to school violence anonymously.

There was a time when school violence consisted of getting pushed down near the swings or having your milk money stolen. Students today face cyberbullying, direct and indirect gang-related violence, or even the possibility of a lone wolf attack.

Reporting bullying and other forms of violence gives kids a voice. With Tipline, students can be heroes without putting themselves in harm's way.

Why Tipline?

Tipline is not the first reporting service in the world, but it does stand-out from the ones already out there. See, Tipline favors human common sense over automation to keep false positives low.

Comments can be misconstrued, imminent danger can be inferred, and sometimes hoaxes happen. As such, tips are given a risk assessment, using multiple resources to verify any information provided. This way, schools won't be alerted to song lyrics or movie dialogue excerpts.

Due deliberation goes into our alerts, something automated systems simply cannot do.
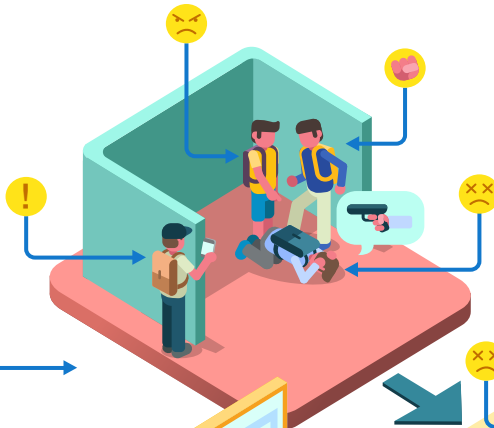

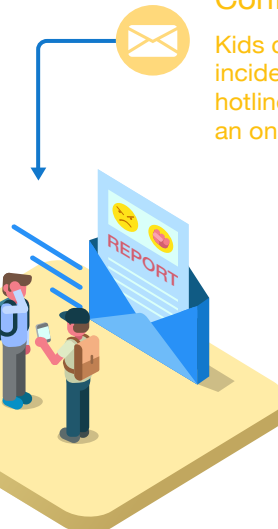

Kids can stand up to school violence

Conflict is Witnessed
When kids see bad things happening, they know that physically intervening will only make thing worse. They can still do something about it.

Conflict is Reported
Kids can anonymously report the incident to Tipline by calling the hotline, sending an email, through an online form, or sending a text.

GUIDANCE

Conflict is Analyzed
The Tipline team applies a risk assessment to each report, then immediately alerts districts to situations that are deemed urgent.

Conflict is Resolved
Because an adult was alerted, an incident that might otherwise go unnoticed is addressed directly, and the cycle of violence is stopped.
