

Noted National Figures Who Have Spoken Out on Psychiatric Drugs and Violence

Congressman Ron Paul: In a speech given on March 8, 2013, Ron Paul stated, "I have children and grandchildren, I'm a physician, and I think drugs are very, very dangerous. But, if you compare the so-called illegal drugs to prescription drugs, a lot more people die from the prescription drug abuse. Right now we're suffering from an epidemic of suicide in some of our veterans, and we have a lot of violence in our schools and somebody just did a study in which they took the last ten episodes of violence where young people went and took guns and irrationally shot people, all ten of them were on psychotropic drugs. So this is a different problem than some people might think."

Michael Moore, author, director and producer of Bowling for Columbine, was interviewed where he calls for a federal investigation into the link between prescribed drugs and mass shootings such as the 1999 Columbine massacre. In the interview he said: "In Bowling for Columbine, we never really came up with the answer in terms of why this happened. I think we did a good job of exposing all the reasons that were given, were a bunch of BS. You know Marilyn Manson, caused them to do it, this or that caused them to do it and none of it really made any sense. That's why I believe there should be an investigation in terms of what pharmaceuticals, prescribed pharmaceuticals, these kids were on and perhaps it would just be shocking, I think, to the millions of parents who prescribed this for their kids. If it was finally explained to them that this was the case, that this perhaps occurred for no other reason other than because of these prescriptions."

"Imagine what that would do, imagine how people would totally rethink things. Grasping for every little straw they can to explain why something like Columbine happens, when in fact it may be nothing more than this. How else do you explain two otherwise decent kids, very smart, no history of violence to other kids in the school? Why them? Why did this happen? It's an extremely legitimate question to pose and it demands an investigation.

"The Eli Lilly corporation, pharmaceutical company, for nearly fifteen years covered up their own internal investigation that showed that anyone on Prozac is twelve-times more likely to attempt suicide than those using other antidepressants—not twelve-times more than the average population—twelve-times more than those already on other antidepressants. This is a criminal act and I want to know why these criminals are still walking the streets."

David Kupelian is an award-winning journalist, managing editor of WND (WorldNetDaily) and editor of Whistleblower magazine. A widely read online columnist, he is also the best-selling author of The Marketing of Evil and How Evil Works.

On January 6, 2013, Kupelian published, "The Giant, Gaping hole in Sandy Hook Reporting—what psychiatric medications shooter may have been taking." Kupelian questions, "But where, I'd like to ask my colleagues in the media, is the reporting about the psychiatric medications the perpetrator – who had been under treatment for mental-health problems – may have been taking?" He continues, "It has been more than three weeks since the shooting. We know all about the guns he used, but what 'medication' may he have used? ... So, what is the truth? Where is the journalistic curiosity? Where is the follow-up? Where is the police report, the medical examiner's report, the interviews with his doctor and others?"

WND.com gets an average of 2.5 million unique visits to its website each month.
