

The FAST Plan for Tax Reform shows that current federal taxes can be reformed so that they are fair, accountable, and simple without having to create new tax collection structures.

The FAST Plan for Tax Reform has two segments of nearly equal length. The first segment is a main text that has been written for anyone who has an interest in federal tax policy. The second segment contains multiple appendixes and other materials that collectively provide data, calculations, and other facts that support the main text.

Donald E. Phillipson received his JD from Stanford Law School. He has had more than four decades of experience as the lead trial lawyer or a consultant in federal court commercial and natural resource lawsuits. He lives in Golden, Colorado.

The FAST Plan for Tax Reform

- Exposes hidden facts about deficit spending and the national debt
- Uses fairness, accountability, and simplicity as criteria for judging all federal taxes
- Critiques alternative federal taxation approaches
- Debunks federal taxation myths with facts
- Reveals new perspectives on individual total federal tax obligations
- Proposes the FAST Plan with data-based tax reforms that are new, comprehensive, and practical and meet the fairness, accountability, and simplicity criteria
- Provides historic data on deficit spending, the national debt, marginal total federal tax rates, kinds of individual income, and economic effects of tax law changes

The FAST Plan

- Achieves a nondiscriminatory individual income tax with a standard rate that is also a maximum total federal tax rate
- Automatically eliminates the marriage penalty and any need for an Alternative Minimum Tax
- Ends tax gamesmanship by corporations
- Treats heirs the same tax-wise as a decedent before death
