

THE PAL AWARD is the only Toy Industry recognition led by a credentialed speech and language expert, calling out the language learning edge in exceptional toys, games, books and media. Through their design, quality, content and character, PAL winners spark Play that Advances Language. Sherry Artemenko's selections based on 35 years of child development experience and over 15,000 hours working with kids, empower her unique reviews that explain how parents can best use her winning PAL recommendations.

2019 PAL AWARD

Importance of Play and PAL Value Add

"Play is the most important part of childhood ... It's how they develop emotionally, cognitively and in language — It's important to understand how all of us, and especially parents, can encourage play."

Dr. Benard Dreyer, director of developmental & behavioral pediatrics at NYU's Medical School

- PAL VIDEO REVIEWS - Gives tips on how best to raise the level of language learning through great PAL products

"From thousands of hours working with kids to build their language through play, I intuitively identify the learning potential in toys and games. It is my passion to share that perspective with parents, educators, brands and retailers, to be more attuned and committed to smart play. Producing great play involves looking deeper into the toy's potential. What is the importance of dollhouse play as kids experiment with roles, practice dialogue, experience other points of view, negotiate plots, and generate stories? How can play with a train set be elevated by adding people, stations, houses or schools? Are we looking for board games that require critical thinking, problem solving, emotional intelligence (EI), group collaboration, grammatical insight, or reading readiness? When we pick up the level of play through careful selection of toys, kids can strengthen essential learning skills while having loads of fun!"

Early language proficiency correlates with later school performance, reading, writing and critical thinking skills, and influences emotional, cognitive and social growth. From their first words to little sentences and storytelling, children progress in their ability to express feelings, connect relationally, solve problems, make decisions and navigate life. Consulting in the schools, Sherry recognizes the current demand for solid language skills necessary to achieve, especially in STEM curricula, where students are increasingly challenged to explain the "how" and "why" of concepts mastered. Strong language supports being STEM ready, and ready for life.
