

Radaris Increases Civil Court and Criminal Records with Addition of New Data Sources

Newly released public records from civil and criminal courts greatly increase the numbers of marriages, divorces, bankruptcies, arrests and citations available in background checks

Radaris, the public records search engine, today announces a great addition to its industry leading background check service. New data sources add more than one million new city, state and federal records. The additional records significantly update and increase the amount of civil, court and criminal arrest records available in premium reports.

Radaris background checks extend the white pages model of free public record profiles on every person in the country. They allow people to find classmates and old friends, research online dates, new roommates and neighbors, or verify anyone's identity and personal history.

Frequent customers of Radaris are already familiar with the depth and accuracy of these background checks. Those people looking for a new source of information will find the most complete contact information, including; full name, phone number, date of birth, current address, family relatives and names of other people living at the same address.

Now, people will find civil court records that include more marriage certificates, divorce applications, bankruptcies, outstanding debt records, evictions, business filings and property records. The increased criminal court records include specific settlements, along with sentencing for probation, community service, and jail time. The new arrest records detail each of the most recent criminal charges from misdemeanor to felony. They include traffic violations, speeding tickets, public intoxication, possession of controlled substances and assault.

Additionally, reports purchased in the past will be automatically updated to include these new records whenever they exist.

To find all of the most current civil court and criminal records available, visit Radaris.com today.
