The New Roseland Community Hospital and Tell Health are partnering to combat COVID-19 and help Chicagoans get back to work

The New Roseland Community Hospital announces a partnership with Tell Health, a mobile healthcare communication platform, that enables providers to securely communicate via video, voice or text directly with patients and their families.

“This app allows the hospital to provide testing results and other patient information quickly and efficiently,” says Tim Egan, CEO of Roseland Community Hospital. “The platform has enabled Roseland Hospital to halve the time and effort spent getting results to patients and when compared to traditional patient portals, it has increased patient engagement 6-fold,” he added.

“The Tell Health service is a very effective and efficient way of communicating with patients in real time,” said Dr. Terrill Applewhite, chairman of the hospital COVID-19 task force.

Victoria Brander MD is an Associate Professor at Northwestern University Medical School and has worked with the app. “I have tried several other communication tools, but none is as easy and efficient as Tell Health. It’s practical and clinically oriented,” she added.

“The ability to get my healthcare results directly on my phone through the Tell Health app is so easy and comforting,” said John Poulos, a patient.

About Tell Health

Tell Health is a Chicago-based startup that has developed an advanced patient communication platform. Integrating with Providers’ Electronic Healthcare Record systems, the HIPAA-compliant platform facilitates engaging healthcare conversations. Tell Health’s mission is to get people back in control of their healthcare, to be fully informed and in possession of their medical records, and empowered to take care of themselves and their family.
